

ARTHUR & Jeremiah

FROM BOSTON TO CALIFORNIA, JERSEY, OHIO, TEXAS, VIRGINIA WITH LOVE

Fabulous Flat

Harbor Point in Dorchester was once Columbia Point, a neglected project. When renovated, the poor ghetto people were replaced with poor college students. Nestled on 50 beautiful acres of waterfront just 15-minutes from downtown, our neighborhood has a free gym, pool, and ample parking. Our apartment is quite unBoston: spacious, free AC / heating, and lots of electrical outlets.

LOOKING BACK, LOOKING FORWARD

Two-thousand four marked the twenty-first year of life for Arthur and Jeremiah. They celebrated appropriately and then went back to doing Really Cool Stuff, such as being an Executive Producer and Art & Design Producer for The 24th Annual EVVY Awards, the largest student-run TV show in the U.S.

Arthur travelled to Cambodia over winter break to produce Barang, a documentary for his senior honors thesis project. It screened in Austin, TX to much acclaim in August. Jeremiah will complete a 3D animation exploring intellectual property rights for his honors thesis project this coming spring. This summer, the two with a fellow Emersonian will shoot a high-definition documentary in South Africa to explore the first generation living sans apartheid.

While Boston is their current base of operations, Los Angeles beckons them later this summer. Jeremiah will start his internship and Arthur will do something cool as per usual.

ARTHUR

Merry Christmas to those who celebrate, and Merry Christmas to those who do not. On this federal holiday, I wish the best to everyone reading our letter. I have escaped Boston's brutal cold and am enjoying my break in San Antonio's 70° splendor.

I have officially graduated from Emerson College with an honors BA degree of Visual Media Arts specializing in television video with a minor in hearing and deafness. This next year, I am planning to work with the Learning Center, a non-profit school for the deaf, in central MA to produce a collection of narratives, with Grey Matters Media to produce a documentary in South Africa, and Emerson as a lab manager. After returning from Cambodia and producing Barang last year I realized that I have found my passion. I love to make documentaries that can enlighten and cause change within America.

Merry Christmas again and I wish you a wonderful and prosperous new year.

JEREMIAH

As a kid, I never could decide on one thing to be when I grew up. I'm still growing up and much hasn't changed, but this past September was kind of a big deal. In college, I study high definition video, 3D, compositing, and online media. Technical skills are dandy, but I was at a loss for content. I tossed around the idea of becoming a high school teacher, but concluded that people pay more attention to media than teachers. Thus, I want to use my expensive media skills to educate the masses.

This epiphany was triggered largely by the new passions I've discovered while examining the current chaos. The U.S. is in a position to lead the world to a more sustainable future. Perhaps Americans will step-up with some creative media on economic, educational, and environmental issues.

We have much to be thankful for, so here's to another year of love and hope for peace. I love you all!

2005 was a big year for me. I finished my first year of college, seriously contemplated changing the major for which I chose to attend Emerson, moved into my first apartment, got my first job in Boston, signed on as content editor for GreyMattersMedia.com website, and figured out how I want to approach my Honors/B.F.A. thesis. At work, in class, and at home, I'm constantly surrounded by people who are older than me. This can often be simultaneously inspiring and a little intimidating. I have to remind myself to slow down and remember that I'm only nineteen. I don't have to know what I want to do with the rest of my life just yet. After four years of working toward a very specific goal, I've had an unsettling and enjoyable year of learning to appreciate the opportunities I've been given to explore the worlds around and within me. For the moment, the future can wait.
